THE GENIUS PLAN

Character: An individual pitching an idea to a group of people.

Alright, listen up - here it is. The big idea. Took me forever to figure this out, but I've cracked it! I think…

Picture this: A world where we never have to wait in line again. Sounds wild, right? But stick with me. It's totally possible.

Think about it—waiting is the worst. Lines for coffee, tickets, even bathrooms. Hours, just… gone. You could be doing something amazing instead—learning, creating, or even just, I don't know, scrolling in peace. But no, you're stuck. In a line.

But what if we could fix it? Like, completely? Imagine this: You're at a coffee shop, stuck behind someone who's ordering the most complicated drink ever. And instead of waiting, you press pause and just… freeze time. You could read a book, take a nap, or practice your parkour moves. The possibilities are endless!

But… what if it went wrong? What if I mess with time too much? What if everything breaks? Or… what if it hurts someone? (voice cracks slightly, hesitant) What if I can't undo it?

Maybe it's just a dumb idea. Maybe I'm wasting my time, thinking I can solve something like this.

But if I don't try—then what? I can't just sit back and accept that life is one big waiting game. No way! I need to try!

It's risky. It's ambitious. But one day, we might live in a world without lines. And when that day comes, you can bet I'll be the one at the front, saying, "Told you so."
